

Rebekah Bass

Everyone has a mother and a father, at sometime and somewhere. My parents are special. They are supportive and they have taught me to have faith. Both of them volunteer and teach Sunday school at my church and we sponsor children in other countries. Both of my parents volunteer at a lot of places. They have helped guide me on my way to adulthood. I know that I'm not very far in life but they have engulfed me in their love, teaching me to love others. I respect them and they respect me. I will always respect them. I could never replace them. My parents are my ultimate role models.

I love to help others with things that I love to do. I like to inspire people. I try to give back to people who give up their time for me. Whether it's my parents, teachers, or friends. When they try to do something for me I can always make it easier. I do wish that I could say that I do everything right when it comes to helping other people but I can't, so I will be honest and just try to make my endeavors just as meaningful as Dr. King's were on all of society.

To answer Dr. King, I could list off all of the things that I do but a better way to answer is, "I try to do a lot, but I can always do more." I would like to say that I do everything that I can, but I can't. I don't always seize opportunities when they come to help other people. I have a busy life but I should make more time to help others. I was put on this earth to do something special. I think that my talent is music or school. I like to help 'tutor' kids with things that they don't understand and I like to play music for others. I can't imagine doing something as great as Dr. King, but I can try and I will.

By Rebekah Bass